1. EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

The objective of this project was to create pathways between York University Glendon College's Bachelor of Arts programs and selected diploma programs of colleges of the Greater Toronto Area (Humber College, Seneca College, Centennial College, George Brown College, La Cité and Collège Boréal). Glendon College was interested in exploring transfer pathways with the colleges of the region in hopes of recruiting more Francophone and Francophile students and in response to the provincial need to increase access to French-language postsecondary education in central and southwestern Ontario. This project was supported by the Ontario Council on Articulation and Transfer (ONCAT).

By signing these articulation agreements, Glendon College and the participating colleges intended to establish pathways for college graduates seeking to pursue further bilingual studies at Glendon. Demographic information collected from the colleges indicated that a great number of Francophone students were currently studying at English-language colleges. There were also a great number of Anglophone students who were previously enrolled in French-language immersion programs at English-language secondary schools. The development of attractive pathways for these students seeking to continue their postsecondary education in a bilingual environment was one of the main priorities of this project. Therefore, Glendon endeavoured to work closely with these colleges offering programs in the Greater Toronto Area to identify a number of select programs for which clear credit transfer opportunities could be identified. Keeping in mind the provincial call to meet the needs of the Francophone community and improve access to French-Language college and university programs in central and southwestern Ontario, Glendon worked closely with GTA colleges to identify select college programs for which college graduates could receive advanced standing at the university level. The project also took into account existing pathways and credit transfer opportunities already in place between Ontario colleges and other faculties of York University.

Even though the initial plan was to develop a single agreement that would have included all participating colleges, it became quickly evident that a separate agreement needed to be developed for each college. One of the main reasons for this decision was that each college has very different pedagogical approaches to similar programs.

The assessment of college programs and curricula as well as learning outcomes at both program and course levels allowed us to develop unique pathways that French-language college graduates could follow to pursue bilingual university education.

As a result of these efforts, we were successful in identifying a series of bilingual programs in several disciplines that could be offered to Francophone and Francophile college graduates, allowing them to complete their studies at a bilingual university.

The specific college articulation agreements are currently being taken through the different institutional approval processes and will come into effect for students entering the university in the fall 2017.

Glendon and the participating colleges will now be working on establishing student support services to receive the first cohort of students and ensure a successful transition of these students from college programs to bilingual programs.

All involved parties will collaborate to identify effective strategies to promote these pathways.

2. METHODOLOGY

This project was meant to review several programs offered by colleges in the Greater Toronto Area in order to identify possible pathways for francophone and Francophile students. Even though the project team included one project coordinator from Glendon College and one contact person in each college, the team relied heavily on subject matter experts and Glendon and college department chairs were consulted throughout the process. Staff members from academic services at all institutions were also engaged in the pathway development process to ensure consistency with existing institutional credit transfer policies and ease of implementation and clarity for future students.

1. From 2014 to early 2016, Glendon College carefully preselected the potential diploma programs from the colleges that would be a best fit for a number of identified Glendon programs. Given that multiple colleges were involved, it was decided early on in the process to focus on the most common university transfer programs offered by colleges.
2. These selections were made based on a detailed analysis of program overviews and curricula descriptions. This process turned out to be long due to staff turnover at both Glendon College and several colleges.
3. Programs with strong application and hands-on components were excluded given that it was difficult to establish equivalencies between the learning outcomes of such programs and the learning outcomes established in the Glendon BA matrix.
4. After the preselection process was completed, in the summer of 2016, the project coordinator reached out and contacted the colleges to request data on their Francophone students enrolled in each of the programs that had been preselected for a potential pathway. This was another step in the program selection process to ensure that the program selected for possible pathway development were actually the ones that were in high demand among francophone and Francophile students.
5. Glendon College corresponded with the colleges all summer long to ensure that the requested information was collected and the curriculum analysis and comparison could begin.

6. Colleges would share course outlines and curriculum documentation and it would be reviewed by Glendon faculty, be deemed equivalent, and worked into a pathway agreement drafted by the project coordinator.
7. Once key eligible programs were identified and potential equivalencies were identified, Glendon project coordinator met with Glendon Department Chairs to review and validate the proposed course curriculum equivalencies and program pathway. The input and support of the respective Glendon program chairs was considered critically necessary to ensure that learning outcomes, course content, pedagogy and delivery methods were acceptable to maintain the integrity of the university program and ensure student success.
8. The York University transfer equivalency database was reviewed following the development of the curriculum map to determine which college programs may already have been deemed acceptable for articulation with a York University program and could be worked into the pathway without requiring additional course development.
9. By fall of 2016, all the analyses were completed, all the programs had been reviewed, and credit equivalence was weighed and identified.
10. Following a series of focus group sessions and meetings with staff and administration at both Glendon and colleges, the project coordinator then processed all of the acquired data, results and resources to produce detailed comprehensive drafts of the agreements that were completed in winter of 2017.
11. Glendon College Project Coordinator worked with the Academic Assessor at Glendon College, and the Office of the Vice-Provost Academic of York University to inspect and review course equivalencies, admission requirements for students, and blocks of credits that would be granted to ensure congruency with current credit transfer policy at York University.
12. As of March 31, 2017, all proposed agreements have been submitted to the Office of the Vice-Provost Academic of York University for review and approval.

5. IMPLEMENTATION DATE AND DURATION

The articulation agreements signed between York University – Glendon College and the participating colleges will be valid until 2022. At the end of that period, after a joint post-mortem of the partnership activities, the agreement may be renewed. At any time, one of the parties may cancel this transfer agreement with a six-month notice, in writing, to the other party.

6. ADVERTISING AND PROMOTION

Once the articulation agreements are signed, Glendon College and the participating colleges agree to implement a marketing strategy targeting the Francophone community as well as students who attended French-language immersion programs during their secondary school years. The promotion of the identified pathways will be done at the recruitment, admission and academic advising levels. All the parties of this project will ensure the promotion of the pathways during special marketing and recruitment events.

7. SUCCESSES & CHALLENGES

The main success of the project was that we were able to establish and agree on different pathways that would facilitate student mobility of a particular group of students that normally do not avail themselves of transfer pathways between sectors and between different linguistic groups. On one hand, the project allowed us to target Francophone students seeking to pursue a Bachelor's degree in the Greater Toronto Area; thereby increasing access to French-language university pathways in central and southwestern Ontario. On the other hand, by targeting Anglophone college graduates who attended French-language immersion programs at English-language secondary schools prior to enrolling at a college, the project allowed us to identify a number of very attractive college-university pathways that would enable these students to be able to pursue a bilingual Bachelor's degree, after an English-language college program.

The exploration of the pathways was also a valuable learning experience at the institutional level as it initiated new relationships and opened conversations between Glendon and local colleges.

Glendon was initially planning to develop a single agreement that would have included all colleges but it became quickly evident that the development of separate agreements for each college was necessary, given that each college has a very different pedagogical approach to similar programs.

The identification of credit equivalencies between bilingual university programs and English-language college programs presented some challenges. While learning outcomes can be a useful tool when analyzing programs for a pathway, a course level assessment is also essential as learning outcomes can be subjective to a program or to an institutional orientation.

Another challenge was the constant academic and curriculum changes within institutions. As institutions review their programs, these identified pathways will have to be revised to ensure that students are not presented with pathway opportunities that no longer exist. Some colleges expressed an interest in the development of potential pathways for some of Glendon's new programs such as communication and biology. Unfortunately, given that these programs are still fairly new and that upper years were still in the developmental phase, it was decided not to include them at this time.

Finally, the project encountered some challenges in the identification of maximum credits for college programs. This was mainly due to the fact that Glendon programs had additional bilingualism requirements, i.e. students have to take a minimum of 6 credits at the 3rd and 4th year levels to demonstrate their second language proficiency.

As of March 31st 2017, the specific college articulation agreements are currently in final stages of revision and will be signed shortly in order to come into effect for students entering the university in the fall 2017.

Glendon and the participating colleges will now be working on establishing student support services to receive the first cohort of students and ensure a successful transition of these students from college programs to bilingual programs.

All involved parties will collaborate to identify effective strategies to promote these pathways.

8. LESSONS LEARNED

- In order to maintain the quality standards of university-level education while granting advanced standing to college graduates, we must conduct a very thorough curriculum analysis to ensure integrity of the program, including appropriate affinity of the diploma program to support degree learning outcomes. This ensures students being admitted with advanced standing are not at a disadvantage.
- It is critical to allocate sufficient time to the curriculum mapping process.
- It is important to remember that with the introduction of experiential education in university programs, the line of demarcation between applied and academic programs is becoming more blurry.
- The labour market needs and skills required to be successful in a particular field should be the driving force behind the development of articulation agreements and not merely an exercise of granting a large number of credit equivalencies to college programs.
